Berlin is a city with a rich and fascinating history. From the rise and fall of the Berlin Wall to the Cold War, Berlin has seen it all. And beneath the city's bustling streets lies a hidden world of abandoned bunkers and tunnels.

One of the most intriguing of these bunkers is the Follow Me to Armageddon Bunker. Built by the Soviets during the Cold War, this bunker was designed to protect the city's elite in the event of a nuclear attack.

Today, the Follow Me to Armageddon Bunker is open to the public for tours. And it's an experience that you won't soon forget.

What to Expect on a Follow Me to Armageddon Bunker Tour

When you arrive at the Follow Me to Armageddon Bunker, you'll be greeted by a friendly tour guide. Your guide will then lead you down a series of stairs into the bunker.

As you descend, you'll feel the temperature drop. The bunker is dark and damp, and the air is thick with the smell of history.

Your guide will tell you about the history of the bunker as you walk through its various rooms. You'll learn about the people who worked and lived in the bunker, and you'll see the equipment that they used to survive.

The tour will take you through the bunker's sleeping quarters, dining rooms, and medical facilities. You'll also see the bunker's command center, where the Soviets would have directed their response to a nuclear attack.

At the end of the tour, you'll have the chance to ask your guide any questions that you have. And you'll be able to take some amazing photos of this unique and historic site.
